fess her guilt, and maintained herself with much stoical firmness; but, on learning that there was no longer any hope for her, her fortifude began in some measure to fall, and she began to feel more sensibly her awful situation. On Thursday, the 22d inst. two days previous to her execution, she made a fall confession of the crime for which she was to die, and acknowledged the justice of the sentence which was shortly to end her existence, in the presence of Judge Weston, John W. Cady, late District Attorney, Sheriff Thompson, Rev. Jas Otterson, and Rev. David Eyster. In this confession she denied having poisoned her first husband, whom it had been reported she had also murdered. But on Friday morning, the 23d inst. as her end rapidly approached, and down the confession of rather made an additional confession, admitting that she had given her first busband a dase of arsenic, which, atthough he did not die immediately, was ultimately the cause of his death.
